These two statements are utterly irreconcileable. Who is to decide which is, the accurate version? Which nation is generally regarded as having the most regard for the truth?"

But this is not the only question. The Chinese contend that the Tientsin Convention not being ratified had not come into operation, and that therefore the clause providing for the immediate retall of the Chinese garrisons in Tonquin could not reasonably be insisted upon, and any attempt to evict them would bea breach of the peace by France. What concerns foreigners in China most now, however, is what will be the outcome of this new complication. The general belief is that China will not fight.
